Over the past several years, the use of underground piping has become more common, and more prevalent. As more and more underground piping is installed, it is becoming more important to be able to provide a quick and effective means of tightening the pipes after they have been installed. Although simple metal clamps can be used to clamp pipes or ducts, they are not very effective because they are difficult to apply and to remove, and because it is difficult to provide a consistent uniform tension on the pipe. More importantly, metal clamps do not provide a continuous tight seal when the pipe is under pressure, as is required for many applications. Steel or plastic bands are often used to apply a tight seal around the outer circumference of pipes and ducts. Although these bands provide a tight seal, they must be tightened around the pipe by applying a wrench or some other device. This is a time-consuming and often difficult process. Further, if the pipe is too long for the worker to reach around, the worker may have to stand on a ladder or some other device to apply the band, thereby raising safety concerns. Therefore, it is an object of this invention to provide a clamp which applies a consistent uniform tension to a pipe or duct to which the clamp is applied. Another object of this invention is to provide a clamp which has a tightening action applied by magnets, which magnets can be located at either end of the pipe or duct, and the magnets can be secured so as to provide a secure grip on the pipe or duct. A further object of this invention is to provide a clamp which can be used to clamp a pipe or duct under a wide variety of conditions, even on uneven ground. Still another object of this invention is to provide a clamp which is simple and inexpensive to manufacture, easy to use, and which is applicable to a wide variety of pipes and ducts. These and other objects of the invention will be apparent from the following description and from the drawings in which:
