It's a foot-operated tube tremolo that works with a guitar's volume control, simulating the sound of a tremolo arm, with no needles moving. The effect is controlled by rotating a small knob on the bottom of the pedal. It's built around a patented motor so that it doesn't need any power supply. It works on any volume knob — the traditional 6- or 9-volt battery-powered ones, and also has a foot-powered option. As mentioned earlier, this effect is controlled by rotating a knob on the bottom, and you can have as many repetitions as you want. When you turn the knob back in the opposite direction, the volume goes up for the "seek" effect. I tried this pedal for a day and had a lot of fun playing with it. It's a foot control, but you can put it on a pedal board and use it with a foot switch if you wish. There's a plastic base that holds the pedal, and then you mount your guitar on a clamp. It would work well with acoustic guitars, and if you pick up a foot pedal for it, you should have no problem. In a nutshell, I'd call this a very affordable pedal that can be used as an effects pedal, and maybe even just as something to play around with. The only thing that may be a little confusing if you've never used a gear-based tremolo system is that you can control the tremolo speed with the volume knob of your guitar. You set the effect to your liking and then play the guitar without the tremolo set. Once you turn the effect back on, the volume knob comes off of your guitar's volume control, and the tremolo speed is changed. It's not the same as normal tremolo in that you don't have a ton of control over how fast the tremolo is changing. But if you want to play around with it and learn what it does, go for it. If the price is right, it's a pedal that you really can't go wrong with. There are many guitarists that enjoy guitar pedals, and at the bargain price of $25, this one doesn't disappoint. You may want to check your local store to see if this is in stock. As of this posting, we do not know when the next
